Turkish Emperor Cannot Realize His New Position

"I will sacrifice my whole life to the people and the constitution." These were Mohammed-Reshad's first words when the Young Turks sent messengers to say he had succeeded to his deposed brother. Though not altogether unexpected, he received notice the day before to prepare his mind for the great change in his life. Mohammed V had been too long a prisoner to throw off all his old ways as soon as he became sultan and caliph. The habits of thirty years die hard. "I er side, which opens on to the avenue of Bechtach. Here Abdul Hamid erected an enormously high wall to whose height he added from time to time as his suspicions increased. Of course, this wall will now be considerably lowered. The sultan's private apartments are to overlook the sea. Furniture has been brought from Yildiz Kiosk, not because of its beauty, but in order to save expense so Mohammed V., in view of the great poverty prevailing in the country and also in order to set a good example to extravagant pashas, has decided to fix his private income at $10,000 a month. This will want to live in my old home at Dolma-Baghtche," he said on his way back from the chamber of deputies, whither he at once drove to take the oath of obedience to the constitution.

"Give Yildiz Kiosk to the nation," he went on. "I will not live in it—it must be turned into a museum and the people must be allowed to visit it." The grand vizier suggested that a new palace might be built for his majesty, or that he could choose one of the many which the ex-sultan had built and embellished. But he would not hear of it.

As the new sultan said he wanted Dolma-Baghtche to be modernized, people were sent there. The sultan himself received them. "I have heard and read that there are machines you put into the houses by means of which you can talk to people at great distances without seeing them," he said to his secretary. The sultan, of course, meant telephones, which he had never seen in his life and which were generally forbidden in Constantinople under the old regime. So several telephones are being set up in the palace. Besides those in connection with the town one will enable the sultan to communicate with his harem without leaving his own apartments and others are to run to his secretaries' apartments.

Hitherto the palace has been lighted by oil lamps and candles. The new ruler is delighted with the idea of electric light and goes into the various apartments where the work is being done, choosing the lamps and giving advice. But he is chiefly engaged in asking questions of the workmen about the way the installation is done. Another innovation is the telegraph office now being set up in the palace itself. Dolma-Baghtche is a handsome enough palace of white wood and marble, overlooking the Bosphorus. But during Abdul Hamid's reign the royal inmate was forbidden to use the rooms overlooking the sea lest he should thereby be tempted to escape. He and his household were confined to the other cover all the expenses of his court and household.

The only really beautiful items of his furnishings are some vases from the china potteries at Yildiz. These potteries, which were closer last year, when the constitution was proclaimed, were quite a hobby of the ex-sultan's, who used to pass a great deal of his time there. The workmen were French, and when the sultan was taken prisoner, the vases found at the potteries were worth upward of $500,000. Some of them have been taken to Dolma-Baghtche and the others will remain in the Yildiz museum, that is to be formed in the simplest possible fashion, with a large writing table he has used for thirty years and will not part with; a few upholstered chairs and many books.

All this is very different from Yildiz, with its hundred pavilions, huge armory and magnificent park. Mohammed himself is different. At first sight, with his blue eyes, kind smile, olive complexion and heavy figure and walk, he makes the impression of a good hearted professor, whose mind is wrapped up in books. At home he still dresses as a civilian, in the fashion affected by Europeans some twelve years back. His shoulders are high and a little bent, as with much poring over books. Hitherto he has only worn a mustache, as according to custom, only the sultan of all the imperial family is allowed to wear a beard. He does not wish to have one now, but it is feared that religious susceptibilities will be hurt and people will ask what sort of a caliph is it who wears a mustache.

So accustomed has Reshad become to being surrounded by spies that during the first few days of his reign he spoke low and hesitatingly, often lowering his voice when speaking of politics, and looking furtively around him as if he feared spies. Little by little he is getting rid of this. But the thirty years of prison have told upon him. It is not many weeks since Abdul Hamid's mid's servants tortured him by sticking pins into his body because he was suspected of holding communication with the Young Turks. As a matter of fact, he did all he could to escape notice, as it was better for those who noticed him. As late as last Easter a young officer was tried by court-martial because, on meeting Reshad's closed carriage in the street, he saluted him and made his soldiers render him the honors usual to the heir apparent.

Though nominally a general in the Turkish army he was carefully kept from serving or commanding. The fact that he went to parliament on his accession, in civil dress, aroused a good deal of comment, some of which was repeated to him. But his amiable bows and smile killed criticism and he at once ordered a black and green uniform of a general of the Macedonian army, which he wore for his first salamluk. In fact, he does all he can to make himself as popular as his brother was hated. Not only has he given up all his private fortune to the nation, but everybody who comes near him receives a gift.

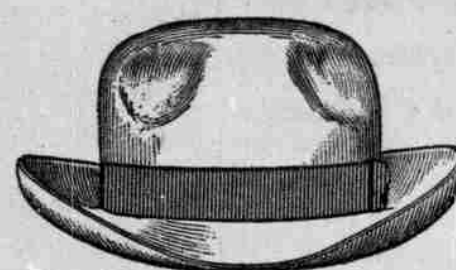

It was Achmed Riza Bey, president of the chamber, who announced his accession. The new sultan offered him the choice of several beautiful jewels. But Achmed refused them, asking for the pen with which the sheik-ul-islam, the head of the Mohammedan religion, after the caliph, signed Abdul Hamid's resignation. This choice had a saddening effect upon Reshad. "I am sorry to see that my brother was so hated," he is said to have remarked, whereat Achmed Bey tried to turn it to good account by retorting: "You forget, my majesty, that the pen which signed his deposition signed your accession. It is the relic of the happiest event in Turkish history."
